

In 1620 his armies defeated the rebellious Bohemian Estates in the Battle of White Mountain. This battle triggered a broader European conflict that would become known as the Thirty Years' War. The war's main cause lay initially in conflicts between Catholics and Protestants, following the expansion of Protestantism after the German Reformation in the 16th century.

Later, however, it took on a more political dimension. In the early stages, Ferdinand overcame Frederick V of the Palatinate in a struggle for the thrones of Bohemia and the Holy Roman Empire, thus assuming sovereignty over Protestants in northern Germany. The war's first phase ended with the signing of the Peace of Prague in 1635. Ferdinand died two years later, leaving his son, Ferdinand III, to continue his battles.

Bratislava coronations

400th anniversary of the coronation of Ferdinand II

Gold collector coin

In 1536, with swathes of Hungarian territory under Ottoman occupation — including Buda, location of the royal residence, and Székesfehérvár, the traditional coronation city for Hungarian monarchs — Pressburg (now Bratislava) became the Kingdom of Hungary's new capital and coronation city. Between 1563 and 1830 a total of eleven Hungarian monarchs were crowned at St Martin's Church in Pressburg, now St Martin's Cathedral. The city's status spurred its development, which peaked during the reign of Maria Theresa in the 18th century. Even after Hungary had been liberated from Ottoman rule, Pressburg remained the Hungarian capital, with the largest population of any city in the country.

Ferdinand II, a member of the House of Habsburg, was the fourth Hungarian monarch to be crowned in Bratislava. The coronation took place on 1 July 1618. During the week before the event and the days immediately afterwards, Pressburg was the centre of not just the Hungarian Kingdom, but also the whole Habsburg Monarchy.

The aristocratic and ecclesiastical elites from all the Habsburg dominions converged on this Danubian capital. There were spectacular celebrations, processions and feasts that generated great enthusiasm among the local populace.

The centrepiece of the coronation ceremony itself was the Coronation Mass at present-day St Martin's Cathedral, after which the new king, wearing his crown and coronation attire, proceeded through the streets and performed further traditional ceremonial acts: knighting selected noblemen at the Franciscan Church of the Annunciation, taking the coronation oath, and presenting himself on top of the Coronation Mound next to the Danube River.

Ferdinand II was one of the most significant figures in 17th century European history. Besides holding the Hungarian crown, he was also King of Bohemia and Holy Roman Emperor. A devout Roman Catholic, Ferdinand played a major role in the re-Catholicisation of central Europe.
